Abstract	Many specialists consider that at the base of the existing depression there is an improperly regulated financial system that points out severe weaknesses of the new liberalism. The existing world financial depression, especially its control points out the recurrent idea of the government intervention in order to provide the economic policies with more reason and pragmatism. That is why, among the contemporary economic mechanisms, there is a periodical change of the government intervention amplitude under the circumstances of maintaining the essential role of the market forces in resource allocation and stimulation of the entrepreneurial spirit. The essay points out some conclusions: non-existence of some economic “pure” systems; free market; pure and perfect market which is a fiction; the mixed economy in the modern meaning, the economy based on reality, which represents the real economic system where the mechanisms of the free market intermingle with the regulatory measures which refer to the state intervention in the economy.
